

Not Killing and Liberating the Living

by Great Master Lyan Chr

By Killing a Snake, the Son is Harmed

In Je Jyang Province in the southern part of Jyang Shan City, there was a farmer who had a murderous disposition, and he harmed and killed many creatures.

During the Ching Dynasty, in the fifth lunar month of the sixth year of the Tung Jr reign period (A.D. 1868), one day he was carrying his hoe to the vegetable fields, and he happened to see a big snake in the distance glaring its eyes and flicking its tongue. The farmer went after the snake, and using his hoe, he fiercely chopped the snake to death.

The farmer was already over forty years old at the time, and he had only one son, who was eight or nine years old. That night, his son dreamt he saw a venomous snake, which was biting and hurting him, and he woke up in a fright.

The next day, he had hot and cold flashes. The doctors were unable to cure him. When he was semiconscious and on the verge of death, he clearly saw the big snake that the farmer had killed turn to him and fiercely bite him. He called out loudly in terror, his eyes glared, his tongue stuck out, and he died.

The farmer thus caused the line of his descendants to be cut off.